Human capital is the most important resource in the modern economy. Individuals invest in human capital by acquiring education, training, and experience. However, not all individuals invest, and those who do invest in human capital may not do so for the right reasons. For example, individuals may invest in human capital to increase their earnings, but they may also invest in human capital to increase their status or to increase their power. This paper examines the role of human capital in the modern economy and the reasons why individuals invest in human capital. It also discusses the implications of human capital for the future of the economy.
